The derivation of this word has long been a bone of contention. In Vedas it refers to Indra. Later on it was applied to Śiva. An alternative derivation can be suggested which is more appropriate. अहिना (शोभितः) बुध्नः यस्य One whose neck is beautified by a snake. The southern recension of Amarakośa includes it in Śiva's names:—अष्टमूर्तिरहिर्बुध्न्यो महाकालो महानटः. दीपिकाभिः दह्यमानः कुलपुत्रकः, तेन प्रसाद्यमानं मातृणां मण्डलं यस्मिन् तं दीपिकादह्यमानकुलपुत्रकप्रसाद्यमान-मातृमण्डलं One noble youth blazing in the midst of lamps was propitiating the array of Mātr̥s. It is common knowledge that a Dravidian worshipper comes in for a lot of ridicule at the hands of Bāṇa as may be evident from his memorable description of the Dravidian hermit in Kādambarī. The Dravidian worshipper here offers a human skull in propitiation of a ghost to whom he prays for the long life of the king.

Afterwards, the king one day summoned Rājyavardhana who bore the armour, and after providing him with a following of unlimited hosts and an escort of ancient ministers and devoted vassals, sent him to the north to annihilate the huns as a lion would send his cub to slaughter the deer.

And, as he set out, King Harṣa followed him on horseback a few strides. When his brother reached the extremity illumined by the light of Kailāsa, the deer-eyed one (Harṣa) passing through the prime of life which was conducive of the spirit of heroism, remained at the outskirts for a few days sporting in hunt in the sites adjoining the Himālayas abounding in lions, śarabhas, tigers and boars as his lovely frame was variegated by the streaks of glances directed by the sylvan deities with zeal, and barely in a few days he cleared the woods of wild animals by streams of glowing arrows issued from his bow drawn to the side of his ear.

One day, in the fourth quarter of the night, at the early morn, he saw in dream a lion being burnt by an uncontrollable fire in the woods, which reddened all the quarters with its spreading rolls of flames. He further saw a lioness jumping and plunging herself into that wild fire leaving the young ones. The idea struck his mind—'Harder indeed than metallic chains are the cords of affection in the world, drawn by which the lower beings too behave like this.' As he rose, his left eye throbbed often and often. Tremor spread over his limbs without cause. His heart seemed accidentally to slip away from the position where it had been fixed inside. Mysteriously did grave gloom spread over him. With his mind torn by a hundred misgivings as to what this meant, he lost all courage, and with his face bent deep in thought, he that possessed eyes like Cakora, through his eyes with steadfast pupils, furnished the Earth for a while, as it were, with land-lotuses just blooming. That day he sported in hunting with a vacant heart. And, as the Sun ascended the middle of the day, he came home; and as light fans played gently on both his sides, he remained apprehensive, lying on a rattan cushion spread on the floor, bespangled with the very cool drops of sandal juice and furnished with a pillow white like the Moon.

Then from at a distance he espied Kuraṅgaka who had ominously travelled a long distance; he had wrapped up his head with a fragment of cloth containing a letter and blue in colour like indigo; blackness was imparted to his body by fatigue and the sun's heat such that he seemed turning into charcoal through the fire of grief seated within. Under the pretext of heaps of dust raised by his much nimble feet as he came along in hot haste, the Earth seemed to follow him anxious to hear the news about the king. As both his sides were fanned by the hems of his upper garment tossed about and spread out by the breeze blowing opposite, he came running along in high speed as if provided with wings. He seemed to be propelled at the back by the king's command and drawn to the front by the long gusts of breath due to fatigue.

The Sun whose image was reflected on the surface of his perspiring forehead seemed to tamper with the letter out of curiosity to know the news. His body seemed to have been evacuated by the sense-organs dropped all of a sudden. Due to a vacant heart, he was slipping even on an even track, although weighed down by the importance attaching to the letter. He was a piece of black cloud, as it were, to the thunderbolt of bad tidings about to be let out; a column of smoke, as it were, to the fire of grief about to blaze; and a seed, as it were, of the paddy of sin about to bear fruit.

On seeing him he broke in his heart since his fears had already been roused by the antecedent succession of evil omens. Kuraṅgaka saluted him and drew near and first delivered the grief writ-

Bearing grief in his heart along with the contents of the letter, he spoke with a famine-stricken appearance, ‘Kurāṅgaka, what is the ill-health of my father?’ He concurrently expressed with his eyes and mouth—eyes streaming drops of tears, and mouth slipping the faltering tones, ‘Prince, it is fever of a high temperature.’ On hearing this his heart suddenly broke asunder, as it were, into a thousand pieces. After sipping water, solicitous that he was of his father’s life, he made over to Brahmins the whole of his personal equipment consisting of unlimited gems, gold and silver. Without even taking his food, he set out. ‘Saddle the horse’ said he to the youth that stood in front bearing the sword by the side of his head. With a trembling heart he

As Lord Sun turned downwards dimmed in splendour as if overwhelmed with grief on the news of the king's illness, the prince, though pressed by the loyal band of princes headed by Bhaṇḍi, did not take his food. As the watchmen marched ahead and procured a relay of villagers who showed the best way, he continued on his march the whole night.

bereft of cries of victory, devoid of the play of harps, music at an end, all joy banished. No musician sang. No shop exhibited its wares. Here, there and everywhere gleamed the whorls of smoke risen from the Kotihoma moving zigzag by the force of wind, making the atmosphere pierced through, as it were, with the edges of the horns of Yama's buffalo and spread over, as it were, with the wire-nets of the god of Death. Batches of crows crying harsh in the day like iron bells adorning Yama's buffalo roamed above and forecast an impending evil. Here the loving kinsmen undergoing fast worshipped Ahirbudhnya; here youths of noble birth glowing in the midst of lights propitiated the array of Mātr̥s (Mothers); here the Dravidians busy in the gathering of human heads for offering to the Deity prayed to ghosts; here

No sooner did he enter than did he behold in the Bazaar street an exhibitor of infernal scenes, surrounded by a body of urchins filled with curiosity, holding in his left hand the cloth-map spread out and fixed to a vertical post containing the picture of Yama riding on his terrific buffalo, and pointing out the scenes of the other world with a reed-cane held in the other hand. And he heard a verse sung by him thus:—

‘Thousands of mothers and fathers, hundreds of sons and wives have come and gone age after age. To whom do they belong, and to whom do you?’

With a heavily bleeding heart he reached in due course the palace wherein entry of all persons

As he offered his salutation, the prince asked him, ‘Suṣeṇa, any change over my father or not?’ He replied, ‘Nothing at present, but may be on seeing the prince.’ Saluted by the doorkeepers, he slowly entered the palace where all sorts of riches were being presented, family-deities propitiated, and milk-food being prepared for offering to gods, and the sixfold offering was made in the fire, and the quivering tender leaves of Dūrvā grass were being thrown into the fire, smeared lightly with ghee mixed with curds. The great Māyūrī prayer was recited, expiatory ceremonies performed, and worship was offered to the spirits for the sake of protection. Brahmins in all

Kings spent day and night, sitting in the courtyard, grieving in heart at not obtaining a sight of their master and awaiting the bulletin of the king's health from his personal attendants coming out from inside. To them bath, food and bedding survived only in name; their dress dirty through the neglect of toilet, they remained motionless as though drawn in a picture. The servants that waited outside with faces depressed in grief banded themselves in groups at the porticos, and conversed in low tones discussing the sad plight of the king. One was accusing the doctor; one was repeating passages descriptive of the symptoms of incurable disease;

There he saw his father in the White House where still silence prevailed, the portals being thronged by a good many watchmen with cane in hand. A triple curtain enclosed the space within, dividing it into a number of yards. The inner door was bolted, and the banging of doors scrupulously avoided; the windows were closed and shut out the draughts. The attendants were languishing. The doorkeepers took offence at the noisy tread of feet on the steps. The bidding of all duties was conveyed by mere gestures without noise. Not far off sat men clad in armour. Water-carriers stood in a corner expecting a call every moment. At the top-floor were seen lurking hereditary ministers locked up in silence. The screened balcony was occupied by female relatives torn by a hundred cares. In the quadrangle thronged the excited servants. A few dear relatives remained inside.

Doctors were nervous about the high fever that had set in. Ministers were struck with grief. Priests lingered. Friends grew melancholy. The experts fell asleep. The trusted vassals felt agony. The chowrie-bearer fell into a swoon. The person in charge of head-cure pined in misery. The hopes of persons depending on the king's grace were shattered. The favourite kings having abjured food out of loyalty to their master grew enfeebled by the loss of strength. Young princes awake all night lay prostrate on the ground. Lads of noble heredity bore agony within. Chamberlains shrank in grief. Bards were destitute of joy. The near attendants grew desperate and heaved. The lower lips of harlots missed the betel (that used to be chewed) and grew pale. Cooks were diligent in bringing the wholesome diet prescribed by the embarrassed physicians. The dependents were drinking water poured in streams from uplifted cups in order to alleviate the drought of the king's mouth. Gluttons were served with feast to the liking of the king. All the dealers were busy collecting drugs. The terrible thirst of the patient could be conceived from the watermen being called ever and anon. Butter-milk was being cooled by the ice formed of snow. Metallic quills were cooled by the dust of camphor applied to wet white cloth. Fresh utensils containing whey for gargle were being smeared with wet clay. Water was oozing out from bundles of tender fibres covered with the soft leaves of lotus. The ground wherein the drinking vessels were placed was strewn with heaps of blue lotus along with their stalks. Boiled water was cooled by being poured alternately in streams. Yellow sugar wafted its fragrance in profusion. The patient's eyes were fixed on the water-pot covered with sands resting on its stand. Fountains played forming circular streams of water coupled with moss. The flour of fried grain was seen conspicuous in crystal platters. White sugar was seen deposited in shallow vessels made of the yellow stone. Vessels made of crystal, shells and conches were seen in plenty containing the cool juice as well as the powder of drugs. There were collected in plenty old fruits of myrobaline, citron, vine, pomegranate and others. The Brahmins made to receive presents were sprinkling drops of water consecrated for driving out evil. Traces of the forehead-paste crushed by the maid-servants were seen sticking to the stones in the White House. The king lying sick at that White House appeared as though he was lit by the fire of fever on the eve of his conquest of the other world. On a bed

Whitened by the powder of pearl, he appeared like the the Ocean getting dry at the deluge. He was shaken rudely by Fate as Kailāsa by Rāvaṇa. Servants ceaselessly engaged in applying sandal paste touched him with their white hands whose palms looked as though reduced to ashes by the much too hot contact of his limbs. As he was starting for the other world, his own fame which was left behind seemed to take leave of him under the guise of sandal coating. Petals of red, white and blue lotuses were applied to his person without interruption whereby his body appeared as though variegated by the glances of Fate. The huge silken cloth pressing the hair tight betrayed the continuous ache of his head.

Through his reflections fallen on the neighbouring water, gem-set pavement and mirror, he betrayed his severe heat. He prized high the swoon as a trusted beloved touching him. Bad symptoms noticed by the panicky physicians took hold of him like the words of invitation communicated by Death. On the eve of his great journey he left the legacy of his persistent torment to the hearts of his well-wishers. Wedded to disgust that he was, liveliness deserted him as if out of envy. He appeared as the assertion of ailments, as the target of attack for emaciation with all its weapons. Imbecility took hold of him; pain made him its sphere of action; consumption converted him into its abode. He was held by languor under-

He seemed to be captured by reverses, torn by agonies, attacked by miseries, eagerly approached by Destiny, focussed upon by doom, tasted by perishability, eclipsed by annihilation, seized by extinction, giving free scope for torment, harbouring dejection, approaching the end, nearing the last breath, situate in the tongs of throes, at the threshold of long sleep and at the tip of the tongue of Death. continuously. He was vanquished by yawnings, swayed by mental torture and pressed by ache at the joints. Queen Yaśovatī sat by his side with eyes swollen due to constant weeping, and fanning the king with the gusts of her breath despite the chowrie held in her hand and with a body soiled by the powder of herbs of different kinds, touched him often and often on the head and chest with the words "My lord, are you asleep?"

On seeing him Harsha's mind was turmoiled by the first shock of grief and grew apprehensive of the frowns of Fate. He deemed his father as already in occupation of the City of Yama. He stood for a moment as though forsaken by his own heart. Courage flew away from him, and confusion brought him under its sway. Joy

With a heart burning like fire, senses dulled as though affected by virulent venom, surpassing the nether world by his gloom and even the ether by his vacant heart, he little knew what to do. Fear touched him in the heart and he touched the earth with his head.

As soon as the king saw his darling son at a distance, despite his plight he was drawn by his extreme love and ran towards him in spirit and extending his arms called out for him with the words 'Come, come.' He rose from his bed, raising a half of his body. The son approached him in a hurry, and as he bowed in modesty the father lifted him and forcibly pressing him to his own bosom seemed in his fondness to plunge into the Pressing the son's limbs to his own, dashing his son's cheeks at his own and shutting his eyes incessantly streaming with tears collected at the edges of his eyelashes, he clasped him long, forgetful of the torment of fever and at last released him with great difficulty. The son bowed before him, approached his mother, saluted her, came back and sat near the couch of his father who gazed at him as if to drink him in with steady unwinking eyes. He frequently touched his son with his trembling hand, and in a feeble voice due to exhaustion he spoke with difficulty, 'Child, you are much reduced,' Bhandi said.

After sipping water he bade the chowrie-bearer, ‘Go and ascertain how is my father and come back.’ He went and returned and informed the prince, ‘In the same state, my lord.’ On being thus informed, he did not care even to take the betel, but with a grieving heart, when the sun was about to set, assembled the doctors and asked them in private with a depressed heart, ‘Doctors, what is to be done now in this crisis?’ They replied, ‘Your Highness, take courage. At that very time the gardener in charge of the lotus-pond in the house recited aloud a stanza of the Aparavaktra metre in consolation of a Chakravāka bird.

‘Bird, hold thy heart firm, leave off thy grief. Take thy stand in the path of wisdom. Along with the Beauty of the lotus-pond the Sun descends on the crest of Mount Meru.’

On hearing the same, clever that he was in the interpretation of voices casually heard, he cast off all his hopes about his father’s life. At night-fall when the doctors had gone, he with courage shattered went once again to the king at the White House. There he saw his father raving in a hundred ways. ‘Great is the heat. without interruption, with a grief-stricken heart, he spent a wakeful night prolonged by misery.

At daybreak he climbed down, and though the horse was got ready by the horseman at the threshold of the palace he walked to his chamber on foot, and hastening there to send for his brother, he sent swift pedestrians and fast drivers on camel's back on and on. After washing his face he did not put on the toilet equipment brought by his servants. He heard the indistinct cry, 'Rasāyana, Rasāyana' raised by the dejected young princes standing in front. And he asked them, 'Gentlemen, what about Rasāyana?' On being questioned, all of them stood mute. On being pressed again and again, they stated reluctantly with grief, 'Your Highness, he has entered

He was not able to keep up his heart blinded by grief as if it had been torn asunder, and he thought in his mind, 'Indeed a noble-born person would rather not be than like an ordinary person intimate displeasing or disgusting news. By doing this at this crisis his noble birth has been rendered all the more glorious like pure gold by entering the fire.' Again he thought, 'Or perhaps, this is in keeping with his love. Was not my father his father, my mother his mother, and we his brothers? Even if any other master passes away, it will be a shame to cling to life in the world. kinsman whose favour is never fruitless? Now he has acted properly in burning himself. Nay, what is burnt of him who stands permanent in fame lasting down to the deluge? He simply fell in the fire, but we are burnt. Blessed indeed is he, the foremost of men of meritorious actions. But wretched is this royal family which has been deprived of such a noble youth. Further, what is the high mission of my life, or what is its purpose yet in store, or what is the pre-occupation that prevents my cruel life from starting away? What is the hindrance for my heart that it does not break into a thousand pieces?' Thus afflicted by grief, he did not go to the king's apartment. He neglected all his duties and fell into his bed and remained covering his body and head with his upper cloth,

When Prince Harsha was in this state and the king himself in that plight, the hands of all people seemed riveted to their cheeks, streams of tears pasted to their eyes, eyes joined to the tips of their noses, cries of lament engraved in their ears, the words, 'Alas, what a pity!' associated by nature with their tongues, breaths multiplied on every face, words of grief writ on every lip and throes stored in every heart. Afraid, as it were, of the scalding tears, sleep did not enter the hollows of their eyes. Smiles vanished as if swept away by the gusts of sighs. Speech did not come out as if totally burnt by torture. No fun was heard even in chats. Nobody knew where music parties fled. Dance was not even remembered, as if it were an experience of the previous birth. No ornament was put on even in dreams. No talk of pleasures could be had. Even the name of food was not mentioned. Drinking bouts resembled a bloom in the sky. The praises of bards seemed taken away to the other world. Joy seemed to be a matter of by-gone days. Cupid was once again burnt, as it were, by the fire of grief. None left the side of his bed even during the day. Gradually, a number of abnormal phenomena appeared simultaneously on all sides in the world, foreboding the calamity of a great person and instilling fear as an index of the king's extinction.

Accordingly at the outset the earth quaked swinging the entire range of great mountains as if desirous of going along with the king. As if remembering Dhanvantari at the time, the seas got agitated with noisy billows dashing against each other. The comets arrayed in a frightful curve emitting heaps of flames rose high as if they were the rough curly clusters of hair let loose by the extremities of the sky afraid of the king's extinction. With all the quarters rendered ghastly with comets, the Universe put on a gray appearance as though pervaded by smoke of the Homa performed by the protectors of the extremities of the sky with a view to prolonging the life of the king. In the Sun's disc shorn of lustre and lurid as a heated iron jar, somebody solicitous of the king's life seemed to have made an offering of a human body under the pretext of a frightful headless trunk. Shining in the midst of a flaming ring of lustre, the moon seemed to have constructed a fortification of fire as if out of fear for the eclipse which, was more and more extending its sway to devour him. Decked by the lustre of the king's valour, the quarters were burning as though having entered the fire in advance out of deep love. Dame Earth with body reddened by streams of flowing drops of blood appeared as though clad in ruddy robes in order to follow the king in death. The portals of heavens were blocked with untimely masses of dark clouds like iron bolts applied by the regents of the sky, afraid of the the crisis of the king's extinction. Frightful blasts of tempests were on the increase, piercing the hearts and sounding like drums beaten aloud on the occasion of the march of the God of Death. Showers of dust, gray like the hair of camels, dimmed the Sun's lustre as if raised by the hoofs of the buffalo of Yama approaching fast. The next day the female doorkeeper of Yaśo-vatī, Velā by name, came to him from the king's apartment, enquiring the by-standers,—‘Where is the prince? Where is the prince?’ As she came in high speed, the ornaments worn by her dropped down with a jingling noise as a result of which she appeared to proclaim loudly the victory of grief.

The domestic swans set rattling by the jingling anklets in motion on her slipping feet seemed with lifted necks to ask her from far off, ‘What?
What is the matter?’ The home-bred cranes echoing the jingle of girdle slipping on her broad hips appeared to teach her the way, blinded that she was by tears. She wept, her face being covered with a mass of blood oozing from her forehead cloven by the plate of the door which she had failed to notice as with the fringe of her red garment. She threw off her cane appearing like the

Her breasts were covered with tossing clusters of hair bereft of dressing as in mourning, hanging down her drooping shoulders and moving in the breeze with a jet-black hue and consequently appearing like a rag of the Tamāla tree's bark. She quaked her hand whose palm was swollen and reddish brown through the strain of beating her breasts, which in consequence looked as though burnt by the frequent wiping of her exceedingly hot tears. As the people standing near were reflected on her cheeks, she bathed them, as it were, in the tears streaming from her eyes with a view to their entry into the fire of grief. Greeted by the eyes of the people struck with panic, she drew near, placed her hands on the pavement and drenching, as it were, her lower lip which was getting dry and gray with the streams of the lustre of her teeth, intimated with a face downcast, 'Your Highness, help, help. What a resolve has been made by the queen when the king is yet alive !'

Then, on hearing of that further crisis the prince became forsaken, as it were, by courage; melted, as it were, by sorrow; drunk, as it were, by cares; sacked, as it were, by torment; and adopted, as it were, by worry; and he fell into a swoon. And as he regained his consciousness he

As he entered with ears being burnt by cries such as these, he saw his mother coming out. She had made a present of the whole of her wealth and put on the funeral decoration. cremation. With bangles slipping down at every step, she seemed to strew offerings for the propitiation of the family-deities. The wreath of flowers strung with threads hanging round her neck right up to the toes looked like Yama's cradle on which she was seated. The blue lotus on her ears noisy with the humming bee inside seemed to hold a chat with her eyes which resembled blue lotuses. The domestic swans keeping alliance with her gem-set anklets forming themselves in batches and roaming about seemed to walk round her with veneration. She held a picture-board as steady as her own heart resolved upon death, which stood on a par with its associate viz., her life. She clung to the favourite spear-haft of her lord, decked with a garland of white flowers tied round in worship and tossing, which appeared like the banner of chastity. She shed tears in front of the king's umbrella as pure as her own character as in front of a kinsman. She was giving instructions to her husband's ministers who grasped them with difficulty, their eyes being blocked by a flood of tears issuing profusely as they fell at her feet. Her ears were torn by the cries of wail at home whose noise was increased by the mourning aged kinsmen turned back with gentle words of appeasement. Her heart was drawn by the roars of lions in the cage which resembled the voice of her lord. She was embellished by the nurse as well as by her own devotion to her husband. She was held by an old lady as also by the swoon which had begun its sway. She was embraced by her friend as also by the affliction that shared in her woe. She was surrounded by her retinue as well as by torment that took hold of all her limbs. She was attended by noble youths as well as by heavy gusts.

and dived into the blinding darkness of swoon as into the Nether world. She was oppressed by an outpour of affection that had been condensed by long restraint as by the flood of tears. And she was not able to check the flow of tears despite her best efforts. Her latent unbearable grief became manifest through the inordinate tremor of her breasts. With a faltering voice her throat failed her. Her lips quivered with sorrow without a parallel. Her nostrils were pressed with repeated throbbings. She closed her eyes and drenched her spotless cheeks with a stream of tears. With an anguished heart, she veiled her slightly raised face with the thin fringe of her cloth whose edges were suffused with the rays of the nails of her hand as with a white stream of tears springing from within its body. With dripping breasts she recalled to memory his infancy in full from the date of birth down to the day when he lay on her lap. Her memory went back to her parents' home, and often she called out for her parents with the words, "Mother, father, look not on me, a sinner, started for the other world, being thus plunged in misery." She cried out to her dear elder son that was absent, "Ah child, you are not even to be seen by me, unfortunate that I am." She lamented her daughter living in her father-in-law's family, "Helpless are you now." She scolded Fate, "You cruel one, what wrong did I do you?" She deplored herself in several ways saying, "Misery has fallen to my lot such as to no other woman." Suddenly she reprehended Death, "Cruel one, you have

When the vehemence of grief subsided, she raised her son with affection. And as he wept, she with her hand wiped his eyes which as if melting streamed only the more through the lustrous streaks of her nails piled up at his eyelashes. She wiped also her own eyes which filled again and again, distressed by a continuous fall of tiny drops of tears while their whiteness consumed by a deep red hue vacated their midst, their edges were swollen with scalding tears and the eyelashes were bespangled with white drops of tears. She raised her lock of hair and fixed it to the top of her ear as it hung down in grief clinging to her cheeks wet with tears. She extricated her forelocks of hair as they were worried and dragged crosswise

As the upper cloth on her breasts flooded with tears and rendered wet slipped a little, she dragged it up with her hand creating waves of lustre with her nails. She washed her lotus-like face with water poured out from the spout of the silver swan-shaped kettle brought by her hunch-backed female servant whose frame was impressed with the red lustre of the threads at the skirts of her wet garment. She dried up her hands in a clean white towel held in hand by servants who were dumb by birth. Fixing her eyes steady on the face of her son, she stood long and frequently heaved long sighs and spoke, “Child, it is not as if you are not dear to me, or you are devoid of qualities, or you deserve to be abandoned. you at this hour as it is screened by great devotion to my lord. Further, O son, I am neither Lakshmi nor the Earth to indulge in the sight of other males or to quit all mercy, playing the adjunct to sovereignty. I am a housewife born in a family of clean virtues to whom character is wealth. Don't you remember me as the wife of that noble person that fought a hundred battles as the lioness of a lion? Being a warrior's daughter, a warrior's wife and a warrior's mother as I am and won over by valour, how can I do otherwise? My hand was seized by your father of that stamp, the lord of kings, equal to Bharata, Bhagiratha and Nābhāga. services. My forehead has attained the honour of being fixed with a queen's crown hard to achieve even in dreams. My breasts, bearing the jackets of china silk moving in the wind of chowries waved by batches of enemies' wives held captive, have been sucked by sons of your stamp. On the heads of co-wives were placed my feet lit by the rows of rubies on the crowns of the wives of all the military chiefs as they bowed down. All the limbs of mine have thus gained their purpose. What else should I wish for when my merit is on the wane? I should like to die before I became a widow. I cannot stoop like the widowed Rati to cry out meaningless lamentations for a burnt husband. Like the dust of your father's feet, I should like to march in advance in the sky and thus earn the esteem of celestial ladies attached to heroes. When I am already burnt by the fresh pangs of acute misery, what is there in me for fire to burn afresh ? More than death my life alone at this hour would be a grave mishap. Fire is indeed much cooler than the fire of grief due to my lord's separation ever flaming afresh with the fuel of love. How is it fitting that I should cling to life as light as a straw when my lord like Kailāsa is going away on exile ? Further, my son, even if I live, the pleasures of my son's kingdom will not gladden me when I am guilty of the grave crime of neglecting the king's death. To those that burn with sorrow, prosperity brings no happiness, no praise, no fruit. Dear, far above the level of widows I would prefer to survive in permanent fame, not in body. Hence it is that I implore you, my son, not to thwart me by running counter to my wishes." So saying she fell at his feet.

He extricated his feet in a hurry, and bending his body lifted his mother whose head had touched the earth, holding her body with both his hands. Finding the inevitable nature of her grief, seeing that that was the only laudable course open to a noble-born lady and perceiving that she was bent in her pursuit, he stood silent with a downcast face.

Though pulled down by attachment, noble birth asserts itself by appreciating deeds appropriate to the place and hour. Queen Yaśovati too embraced him, smelt him on his head, went out on foot from the palace and walked to the banks of the river Sarasvatī, though the air thick with the cries of citizens seemed to drag her back. And there she adored Lord Fire with timid glances.

Distressed by the death of his mother, the other one too surrounded by his kinsmen went near his father. He saw his father with life lingering a bit, with pupils turned round, longing for extinction like the setting Moon. Overwhelmed with a super-abundance of unbearable grief, he was deprived of his courage by love for the father. He embraced his lotus-like feet which had been fondly esteemed by the array of heads of all haughty kings and shed tears as though his moon-like face melted owing to heat within, as though the moonshine of his teeth attained a liquid form, as though the loveliness of his eyes oozed out and as though the nectar of his

To say 'Take thou the kings in thy fold' serves no purpose to one who has taken the entire world into his fold through his virtues. 'Bear the burden of kingdom' is but an improper bidding to one who is already practised to bear the burden of the three worlds. Meanwhile the Sun too parted with his lustre as the king with his life. And then, the Sun turned downwards as though ashamed of his own guilt in causing the death of the king. He grew red as if heated inside by the fire of grief due to the king’s demise. As if to avoid unpleasant queries and answers he descended slowly from the sky according to the practice in the world. He approached the vicinity of the western Ocean as though to offer libations of water to the king. After presently offering libations of water he had his thousand rays reddened as if burning with the heat of sorrow.

Thus did the Sun retire into the cave of the setting mountain with a tranquil body as if in utter disgust generated by the death of that great king. The Sun's blaze became extinct as if cooled down by the showers of tears of the people gathering all round. The Universe was tinged red as if with the hue of all the people's eyes red with weeping. The day grew black as if scorched by the flare of the hot sighs of numerous persons. Beauty deserted the lotuses as if to journey along with the king in death. The Earth with a change of colour grew black as if in gloom due to the loss of her lord. The afflicted Cakravāka birds quitting their mates and wailing piteously aloud reached the shores of water as noble youths quitting their wives and lamenting aloud resorted to the woods. Alarmed, as it were, by the king's calamity (widowhood), the lotuses closed into buds (hid their treasures). The red shine of the Sun flowed like blood gushing forth from the broken hearts of Sky-dames. In due course the lord of luminaries having gone to the other world survived in after-glow (in the affectionate memory of the people). The evening twilight rose like the banner of Death, spreading an intense lurid hue all over the sky. Clusters of darkness repugnant to the sight.

wear a couple of tree-barks. Let valour do penance in penance-forests. Let heroism clothe herself in rags. Where is gratitude to go to meet him? Where shall the Creator again procure those atoms for the creation of a great man? To virtues all the ten directions are a void. To Dharma the world is all dark. To persons practising weapons birth is futile. In the absence of my father, where are the assemblies of heroes to congregate, consisting of soldiers whose cheeks used to bristle with hair at the talks of battles commenced with a unique enthusiasm in the day? Can I see again at least in dream that lotus-like face possessed of long ruddy eyes? Can I embrace again at least in the next birth those hands which surpassed metallic pillars in strength? Then the cocks crowed aloud as if in grief. The home-peacocks threw themselves down from the tops of trees on artificial hillocks. Birds left their homes and started for the woods. Darkness thinned all of a sudden and pined away. Lamps with oil getting scant (lukewarm in attachment to themselves) longed for extinction. The firmament embraced mendicancy with body clad in shining red robes. Stars, pale like a swallow's neck, were piled up by the morn like pieces of the king's bones. the kings already awake, King Harṣa started up like a lotus-pond lively with swans awake. Then the home-bred swans in the apartments of the harem grew dumb and idle at the cessation of the jingling of anklets, and there remained but a few guards of the harem afflicted with sorrow. The grief-stricken servants of his father lounged in the inner yard like elephants of the forest that had lost their leading tusker. The king's tusker stood idle and motionless, fixed to the post with the weeping mahout seated above. The king's horse stood stationed in the courtyard, distressed by the cries of the stable-keeper. The empty court-hall was barren of the tumultuous cries of victory. When things stood like this, King Harṣa went out of the palace with eyes burning with grief and reached the banks of the Sarasvatī, bathed in it and offered water to his father. Wet with bath and without squeezing the hair dry, he put on a pair of white silken cloths; and sighing heavily, without a chowrie, without an umbrella, without runners clearing the crowd, he walked on foot though the horse was brought near; and with eyes fixed on the tip of his nose and flushed like the red lotus, he appeared to disgorge the fire of grief, afraid of the burning of his father who survived only in the heart; and by the gusts of hot sighs he seemed to emit masses of meat mixed with blood coming out of his broken heart through the lustre of his sprout-like lower lip which, though disassociated from pan and washed clean for a long time, yet retained its natural red colour like the sprout of a divine tree. Thus did he trace back to his home.

averse to enjoyment occupied the vacant sites of forests, living on a few morsels of food. Some turned into sages feeding on air with Dharma for wealth and with veins protruding. Some putting on red robes practised the philosophy of Kapila on hills. Some cast off the crest-ornaments from their heads and put in their stead matted hair, placing their sole reliance on Śiva. Others wrapped up in loose yellow rags displayed their devotion to their master. Others with bodies licked by the tips of the tongues of the deer in the penance-forest advanced to old age, whereas others carrying water both in their eye-cups and Kamandalus rubbed with their tender hands and possessed of a deep red hue roamed about as bald-headed saints.

Harṣa too at that stage treated wealth as a curse, the Earth as a grave crime, kingdom as a disease, pleasures as vipers, home as Hell, kinsmen as shackles, life as calumny, body as treachery, health as stigma, life as the fruit of sin, food as poison, poison as nectar, sandal as fire, attachment as a chissel, and heart-break as a felicity. Averse from all avocations that he was, all these persons surrounded him—youths of ancient families coming down in the succession of grandfather to father, teachers who had commanded respect from generation to generation and whose words were worthy of being followed, aged Brahmins proficient in scriptures, legal code and historical tradition; ministers marked for their learning, high birth and character; kings crowned as such, popular ascetics who had duly realised the truth of the Self, sages unruffled by weal or woe, philosophers clever in expounding the triviality of the worldly existence and men well-versed in ancient folk-lore skilful in allaying grief.

Dominated by them, he did not get a scope for the free play of grief in his mind. Pressed by them with request, he somehow inclined towards taking food and other activities. With a heart going forth to his brother he thought, “If my revered brother comes to hear of our father’s death like the great deluge, will he not bathe in the water of tears and clothe himself in a pair of tree-barks? Will not the royal sage retire to a hermitage? Or, will not the lion among men enter the cave of a mountain? Will he not with his lotus-like eyes flooded with tears look at the earth as destitute of its protector ? Will he, the best among men, affected by the acute poison of the fresh influx of grief, forget himself ? Will he not reject the kingdom approaching towards him in disgust of its instability ? Will he refuse his consent to a coronation, his body flaming with the severe heat of grief ? Will he not turn a deaf ear to the requests of kings if he comes here ? Indeed he was too fond of his father. He always used to say in praise of our father, “Dear Harṣa, did anybody have or is anybody going to have such a stately frame, tall like a golden palmyrah tree ? Is there a lotus-like face like his blooming up all day in its attachment to the sun ? Have you ever met with such stem-like arms shining like a pair of diamond pillars ? End of the Fifth Uchchvāsa.

Verse 2. पातयति etc. कालः महापुरुषान् पातयति Time lays great men low in the dust. कालः, Time, is qualified by three adjectives—(1) एकः It is single. To blow down great men time does not stand in need of any other help. (2) अनन्तः, न विद्यते अन्तः यस्य सः, an instance of Bahuvrīhi compound. Time is limitless. This shows that time is working havoc ever and anon. (3) परिवर्तमानः Taking a revolution. बहून् adjectival to महापुरुषान्. Time takes away a number of great men. This suggests a succession of deaths related in this chapter—of the young doctor Rasāyana, of Queen Yaśovati, of King Prabhākaravardhana and of several others afflicted by the death of the king. सममेव At one and the same time. Within a short duration time kills a number of great persons. अनादरेणैव It respects none. All come within the mischief of time without any distinction of high or low. The verse describes an analogy for this operation of time. अनन्त इव. Time is compared to the serpent Ananta on whose thousand hoods rests the burden of the Earth. How is Ananta? एकः Single. He singly brings about the fall of mountains in the deluge. कालः The serpent is black. परिवर्तमानः When he revolves his hoods, mountains crumble down. शैलान् The great men that are extinguished by time are compared to mountains that tumble down at the deluge. बहून्, अनादरेण and समं are equally applicable to the mischief wrought by the serpent. A. number of mountains go to powder at the same time high or low. It is a common belief that a revolution of Ananta's hoods causes the Earth to quake, much more so at the Deluge. Vide Vishṇu purāṇa :—II. v. 28.

Both these verses are composed in the Āryā metre. Āryā has been defined thus :—

यस्याः पादे प्रथमे द्वादश मात्रास्तथा तृतीयेऽपि ।

अष्टादश द्वितीये चतुर्थके पञ्चदश सार्या ॥

The four feet of the Āryā metre contain in order 12, 18, 12 and 15 mātrās or syllabic instants. All the short vowels contain one mātrā, and all long vowels or short vowels followed by conjunct consonants contain 2 mātrās.

Ocean in such a state, the powder of pearl strewn profusely on the floor resembling the white sands of the Ocean, कालेन etc. The black Rāvaṇa uprooted Mount Kailāsa in days of yore. Here Yama lifts up the king to take him to the land of the dead. अविरत etc. Servants attending on the king apply sandal paste to the body of the king with their hands which are therefore white with sandal. The genesis of the whiteness of their hands is poetically traced to a different source. The king's limbs being very hot, the palms of the servant's hands are reduced to ashes, and hence the hands appear white. लोकान्तर etc. The king is bent on marching to the other world. What he leaves behind is only his fame. Fame is white. Perhaps the white sandal paste applied on his body is none other than his fame. In other words his fame clings to his body under the pretext of sandal-paste. For what reason? In order to bid farewell to the king on the eve of his trip to the other world. अविच्छिन्न etc. Petals of red lotus, white lotus and blue lotus are ceaselessly applied to his body for the purpose of cooling. This phenomenon suggests the spectacle of Yama casting his red, white and dark glances at the king's body. निबिडेन दुकूलपट्टेन निपीडितः केशान्तः, तेन कथ्यमानः कष्टः वेदनानुबन्धः यस्य तं निबिडदुकूलपट्टनिपीडितकेशान्तकथ्यमानकष्टवेदनानुबन्धं मूर्धानं आस्यन्तं A silken towel is tied pressingly round his Apparently the threads were of red silk. The red lustre of those threads marked her beauty. She brought or bent low a silver vessel whose spout was shaped like a swan. Through that spout she was pouring water, with which Yaśovatī washed her face. This indicates that hunch-backed women were largely employed in harems in ancient days. मृङ्गारक is a vessel resembling a Kamaṇḍalu. कलमूक Dumb by birth. अवादीव् Aorist of वद्. न प्रियः नप्रियः an example of सुप्सुपासमास.
